James P. Archibald came to the last meeting of the Tin and Sheet-Iron Workers' Union to defend himself against the charges of having used his influence in the labor movement for selfish political purposes, and when he wanted to know the names of his accusers the chairman of the meeting told

Presently he arrived at the chateau.

"So much the better. But I thought several of the ladies did not hunt."
"They have driven over to visit some neighbors, sir."

He went into the smoking-room and looked for the box of cigars. The box was there, but it was empty.

"This is a nuisance," he exclaimed.

"Some servant, I suppose. Such cigars should be kept under lock and key. There were fully a dozen left last night."

He consoled himself by taking a cigar from another box and then thought of that volume of Misset that he had glanced through in the preceding evening. He had read a page of it to the Countess while Gendrinette was pouring tea. He could easily find it for he had himself put it back in the case.

The library was in perfect order, but in the place where he had put the book he saw nothing but blank space.

"Here's a turn of luck to be muttered!"

"I might better have followed the hunters. All wager I do not even get my bouquet today," and depressed by this idea, he stood an instant before the door of his room before he ventured to open it.

"Bah, I shall see," and he pushed the door open.

"No, by Jove, I was wrong!" he cried.

On a little table by his bed lay the book he had been reading the evening before, and beside it, in a pretty Chinese case, were two cigars. On the table in the centre of the room were the rest of the cigars and the large vase filled with flowers.

"Is there a fairy in the chateau that divines all my wishes?" he exclaimed.

*Ah, here's something that breaks the charan." He had bent over the vase to inhale the perfume of the flowers; the bouquet had not been changed since the day before.

"M. de Chauvaye!"

"I was there, hiding."

"Oh, sir, you were watching me."

"Wait—wait a moment, Cendrillon!"

"No; let me go. Oh, if any one knew..."

"No! I didn't do anything," said Genevieve, "I'm just making up one of those rooms; I shall attend to this one myself."

Oswaldo hastily caught up his hat and croch and laid himself behind a curtain.

The door opened, and, framed in a sheet of flowers, Cendrillonette appeared.

"She was adorable, with her hair falling about her shoulders and down below her knees!"

"Would you care for me a little if I called you 'mademoiselle'?"

"Oh, that would not do: no one would take it seriously." "Cendrillonette?" "Fifteen-year-old Cendrillonette!" Twenty years from now everybody will call me 'Genevieve'!"

"These feet," thought the Baron, "have certainly passed the age when they should be kept in the nursery."
The girl had come from the room, and now, like a new little housekeeper, cast a glance about her. She removed the old flowers and set about making a new bouquet with infinite grace. Next she carefully drew from the pocket of her apron

When all was in order she flitted here and there about the room as if she did not like to leave it.

"Yes," she said to herself, "everything is arranged. Here are his books and his cigars, and here are his flowers. Oh, if mamma would only let me wear long dresses! I'm sure he would find out that

They stood for some moments thus, Chauvay gazing admiringly at the prettiest head bowed before him. Then, drawing her towards him, he murmured:

"And what if he did find it out?" asked a pleasant voice.
